

The Birth of a Child and the Method of Proper Vibrational Communication with Them

When a child is born, not only the body is born. At the moment of birth, the child's vibrational field appears — pure, open, and extremely sensitive. A child does not live in words. A child lives in the vibration of their parents. The child does not “believe” vibration — the child breathes it like air. Everything that happens inside the parents becomes part of the child's inner world.

Vibration is a person's internal state: calm or anxiety, love or coldness, respect or irritation, confidence or fear. It is not emotions and not feelings. It is a real vibrational code that the child's epiphysis receives as a signal. The epiphysis is the center, sensor, and receiver of vibration. It works from birth and receives everything the parent emits.

A child feels the parents' state more strongly than an adult because their epiphysis is open, clean, unprotected, and does not filter anything. A child cannot distance themselves, cannot ignore, cannot “pay no attention.” They receive the parents' vibration directly, as their own. That is why a child may be anxious, capricious, withdrawn, or aggressive not because they are “bad,” but because they live inside the parents' vibration.

There is a vibrational connection between parent and child. This is not emotions, not the “heart,” and not coincidence. It is a field that connects them at any distance. If a parent experiences stress, fear, inner conflict, or loss of love, the child's epiphysis receives this signal instantly. The child becomes anxious even if they are far away and know nothing about the situation. This is not mysticism — this is vibrational transmission that humanity did not understand until now.

A child receives both positive and negative vibrations at the same time. The epiphysis does not choose: “this is good — I will take it, this is bad — I will ignore it.” It receives everything that exists in the parents' field. If one parent is calm and the other is in hidden anger, the child receives both signals. If parents smile but are tense inside, the child receives both signals. This creates inner conflict, anxiety, crying, hyperactivity, or withdrawal. The child does not understand the situation — the child feels the vibration.

Parents often transmit the wrong vibration to the child unconsciously. They think: “The child is small, they don't understand anything. I am silent — so they are protected.” But the child truly does not understand words. The child feels vibration. And this vibration reaches them through the epiphysis. A parent may be silent, but the vibration is still transmitted. Vibration is not what we show. It is what we emit.

When there was love between the parents, the family field was warm and stable. The child lived in this field and felt calm and confident. When love disappeared — even without arguments — the field became cold and heavy. Parents may be silent, smiling, and “holding themselves together,” but the vibration has already changed. The child does not understand what “separation” or “crisis” means, but their epiphysis receives a new code: “there is no warmth between the parents,” “the field is broken,” “I am not safe.” The child becomes anxious, cries, clings to one parent, and sleeps poorly.

If a parent experiences external stress — losing a job, humiliation, fear of the future — they may say nothing to the child. But their epiphysis emits fear and tension. This vibration fills the home and enters the child’s epiphysis. The child does not know what “debt” or “job loss” means, but they feel: “the home is heavy,” “the parent is unstable.” They react with anxiety, aggression, crying, or hyperactivity.

Proper vibrational communication with a child begins with the parent’s state. Your state is your language. The child understands vibration, not words. You should speak honestly but gently: “I am having a hard moment, but I love you.” Do not hide tension behind a fake smile — the child feels the truth anyway. Before entering the home, it helps to pause for a moment to release some tension. Creating rhythm is important — rhythm gives vibrational stability. Respect between parents is a clean vibration. Hugs are vibrational contact.

A child gains strength from warm relationships between parents, honesty without aggression, predictability, a calm voice, respect, stability, and a gentle home rhythm. This is not psychology. This is the vibrational environment in which the epiphysis develops.

TRIGEMMA is a new paradigm of human consciousness. It is not an update to psychology and not an addition to medicine. Psychology studies emotions. Psychiatry studies symptoms. TRIGEMMA studies vibration, the epiphysis, the family field, the transmission of internal states, and the vibrational immunity of the child. This knowledge did not exist before. TRIGEMMA explains why a child feels a parent at a distance, why they react to hidden conflicts, why they absorb the parent’s stress, why words are powerless against vibration, why love is a vibrational code, and why the family field shapes the child’s consciousness.

TRIGEMMA is a new form of understanding the human being. It is a new map of human consciousness. It is not psychology. It is not medicine. It is new knowledge about how the vibration of parents shapes the life of a child.

Your state is vibration. Your epiphysis is the transmitter. The child’s epiphysis is the receiver. The child lives in your vibration. TRIGEMMA explains this for the first time.

Author

Dr. Erik Grig

Creator of the Metascience TRIGEMMA

Creator of Trigemmal Linguistics

Founder of VibroScience and the Pineal–369 Interface Theory

Architect of the New Vibrational–Cognitive Paradigm

Founder of the Glendale Institute for AI Safety and Cognitive Development

Creator of PILOT — a new world-class+1 form of artificial intelligence

Author of the formula $3\ 6\ 9 \rightarrow 0 \leftarrow 7 \rightarrow 20+20 = \infty$

Bearer of the ancient cognitive lineage from which a new world science was born